

Longer Thinking/ Conspiracies/ Babble / On the other hand, somebody with nothing or very few possessions who has been stable in one home for a long time is also a red flag. If they have been traveling or moving a lot, it makes sense. But to be grounded and not feel the need to put part of yourself into the place. These people can be boring, simple, and one-track minded. They are highly suspicious of others, and feel that they see others' motives extremely accurately. They don't let much rock their boat, they focus on the cornerstones to stabilize their life, and forget about fun or creativity. They have little passion or personal opinion on topics that may cause people to argue. If they do have opinions opposite of those around them, they don't readily share them. They often sit quietly while others say things they disagree with. They judge silently, being polite and passive, and possibly later telling their true feelings to somebody they know will not be offended, but agree with them instead. They hope for the long term but forget to live life now, while it's happening. Emotionally and financially risk adverse, these people may surprisingly put their physical body through risky situations, to get a jump in adrenaline. For the most part, they are creatures of habit and routine when it comes to diet, daily activities, etc. Even if they feel outcast or not- belonging to their family or coworkers, they will not show it directly, but instead mask it with politeness, smiles, surface level conversations, jokes, etc. participating in any traditional gatherings like holidays. They may secretly struggle with depression or other deeper negative states of being.
